Introduction

Welcome to the Brewer Morris U.S. in-house tax salary guide for 2025. The in-house tax recruitment market in North America, like the broader accountancy and finance sector, has largely returned to pre-pandemic levels, with hiring gaining momentum.

Over the past few years, the tax recruitment landscape has experienced considerable turbulence. If 2023 was a year marked by uncertainty and miscalculations, 2024 has been a year of recalibration, bringing much-needed equilibrium to the market. This return to stability is a welcome shift, offering new opportunities for both employers and candidates.

Shifting candidate expectations

The evolution of candidate expectations in the post-pandemic era has had a significant impact on in-house tax recruitment. Post-pandemic, flexibility—especially the ability to work remotely—was a major deciding factor for many professionals. While compensation remains important, many tax professionals are now prioritizing work-life balance and flexibility. In fact, some candidates will rather accept a slightly lower salary if it means the option to work from home or enjoy flexible hours.

Opportunities which do not offer hybrid working, tend to be on the market for talent on average 25-35% longer than roles with hybrid or remote working options.

However, most companies are still offering hybrid working, with the expectation people attend the office two or three times a week. These organizations have a competitive advantage when hiring.

Furthermore, we have seen more willingness to go back to the office but proximity to the office and compensation become even more important to get right. Based on conversations we are having with people in the market, people want to work no further than forty-five minutes from home. This is a marked shift from before the pandemic, when people were willing to commute for over an hour each way. Fully remote roles are still in demand, but demand has decreased from candidates and clients who both see the benefit of a hybrid model.

Interestingly, we still are not seeing as many candidates open to relocation as we were in 2019. This is potentially due to the housing market, so will continue to be this way until interest rates reduce.

What to expect in 2025 for in-house tax recruitment

Looking ahead, the outlook for in-house tax recruitment is optimistic. 2024 has already shown steady growth, and we anticipate that this trend will continue throughout 2025. While some economic challenges remain, there is a palpable sense of opportunity in the market. Employers will need to balance cost considerations, candidate expectations for flexible working, and opportunities for career growth to attract top talent.

Throughout 2024, professional services firms have had aggressive layoffs, leaving many exceptionally talented tax professionals immediately available. This is a key time for corporate tax teams to open new positions as we are expecting professional services firms to rebound in Q2-Q3 2025.

Ultimately, for tax professionals, 2025 promises to be a year of opportunity, with growth in key sectors and increasing demand for tax expertise across various industries. Whether you're considering a career move or looking to grow your in-house tax team, the coming year offers significant potential for both candidates and employers alike.

We hope this guide helps you navigate the in-house tax recruitment landscape, and should you wish to discuss it in more detail or have a confidential conversation about your recruitment needs or career goals, please feel free to reach out.
